A correspondent of the London Spectator writing from Ballarat, has the following in reference to the use which the gold diggers once made of their nuggets:

I believe it is a fact, and no fiction, that a successfut digger had a gold collar made for his dog, that he, like his master, might put aside his working dress and be magnificent for the rest of his days. It is a fact that another rode through the streets of Baliarst with his horse shod with gold. To keep a carriage and pair was the great ambition of a digger's wife. There was a woman near Coise, who lived in a common log hut, with nothing but mud for floor, and a couple of stools and a bench or two for furniture. Outside the hut was the carriage, under a tarpaulin, and a pair of horses grazed near. For a year or more she was constantly to be seen on the road to Geelong. Her son drove, and she sat inside in silks and satins gorgeously arrayed, a short pipe in her mouth, and the gin bottle reposing on the cushion by her side. once made of their nuggets :

Considerable damage has been done to fruit and shade trees, and some of the fairest willow trees in private yards have suffered in particular, the snow clinging to them with a death grip, and and breaking down large limbs and branches. The telegraph wires "got it" badly, and not a single whre was working out of this city this afternoon. No Associated Press dispatches were received by the morning papers. Altogether, the storm may be put down as a winter storm. The snow was half a foot deep this morning, and had it alleu on frozen ground there would have been good sleighing.

Editor New York Sun:

DEAR Sin: Is the correspondence department of your jewinal of Tuesday you assert that "sober history knows nothing of Robin Hood," etc. Now, Mr. Editor, I think you have fallen into an error, unintentionally I have no doubt. Of the existence of such a person as Robin Hood, history, (sober, at that,) leaves no occasion for doubt, as for years he had his "headquarters" at a place called Sherwood Forest, in Nottinghamshire, England, accompanied by his band of "merrie men," including the historical, ironically called "Little John," who stood over 6 feet high. In proof of the existence of Robin Hood, I wouldrefer you to a volume of history (sober at that), and poems, published some twenty or twenty-five years ago, by Spencer T. Hall, (a native of Sherwood Forest) called "The Forester's Offering," in which the life of "Robin Hood," and the exploits of his "band" are depicted to the life. You also assert that "he was bled to death by a nun, to whom he applied for medical treatment." If my memory serves me, which I think it does, correctly, he was pierced in the breast ing upon you on this subject, but as it is a matter of sober historical history, I could not refrain. Respectfully yours, W. B. S.

The writer of the above, and not the Sun, is wrong in respect to the history of Robin Hood. There are many stories and some pretended histories of that person, but there is reason to believe that Robin Hood was as much a myth as Robinson Crusoe. Modern English historians have endeavored in vain to discover anything reliable about the existence of Robin Hood.
